PHILIP WARNER

SCC GRAD PHILIP WARNER LIVING HIS DREAM IN JAPAN

Growing up in Bryson City, Philip Warner always thought it would be awesome to go to Japan.

It wasn't so much the rich history and ancient culture tugging at his heartstrings. Rather, it was the technology.

"Everything cool about tech was in Japan when I was growing up," recalled Warner, who graduated from Swain High in 2009. "I always had an interest in tech, and I would talk to my teachers about it. Japan always seemed like a hub."

Far away as Japan may have seemed, Warner immersed himself in tech right where he lived. At an early age, he played his Playstation so much that it broke ... so he took it apart to try and figure out how to fix it.

He later enrolled in Southwestern Community College's Computer Engineering Technology program and began learning the skills he'd eventually put to work in Japan. Not long after he graduated from SCC in 2011, his dream came true – and he boarded a plane for Japan.

He's still working there today.

"After I graduated from SCC, I transferred to Western Carolina University and met a teacher who told me about an opportunity to study abroad," Warner recalled. "So I entered the Japanese program and went to Tokyo."

Warner returned to Western North Carolina in the summer of 2015 and completed a series of internships before graduating from WCU. Immediately after earning his bachelor's degree in Japanese Special Studies (with a minor in CIS), he landed an English teaching job with the RCS corporation in Japan.

He traveled around the country teaching English until he received a call one day from IBM, and he landed a position with that company in April. He's not allowed to describe in great detail what he does, but it's clearly in the field he's loved since childhood.

"I'm a server technician," he said. "I maintain servers in IBM's cloud network. It's very high security. I go in to work and am always learning something new."

His success is no surprise to faculty members who taught Warner at Southwestern. Michael Deaver, SCC's Electronics Engineering Technologies Instructor, vividly remembers Warner as a first-year student who earnestly studied to better understand how electronic circuits work.

"Philip was the type of student who strived to learn everything he could about electronics, computers, servers, networking and anything else technology related," Deaver said. "His determination to know more kept him moving forward, working hard in classes and learning new information every day. During the time he was at SCC, he took every opportunity to apply his hands-on technical education by building computers and home networks for himself and others as well as working on a variety of computer and electronic projects."

Now that he's living his dream, Warner has learned to adjust to an entirely different lifestyle in Japan.

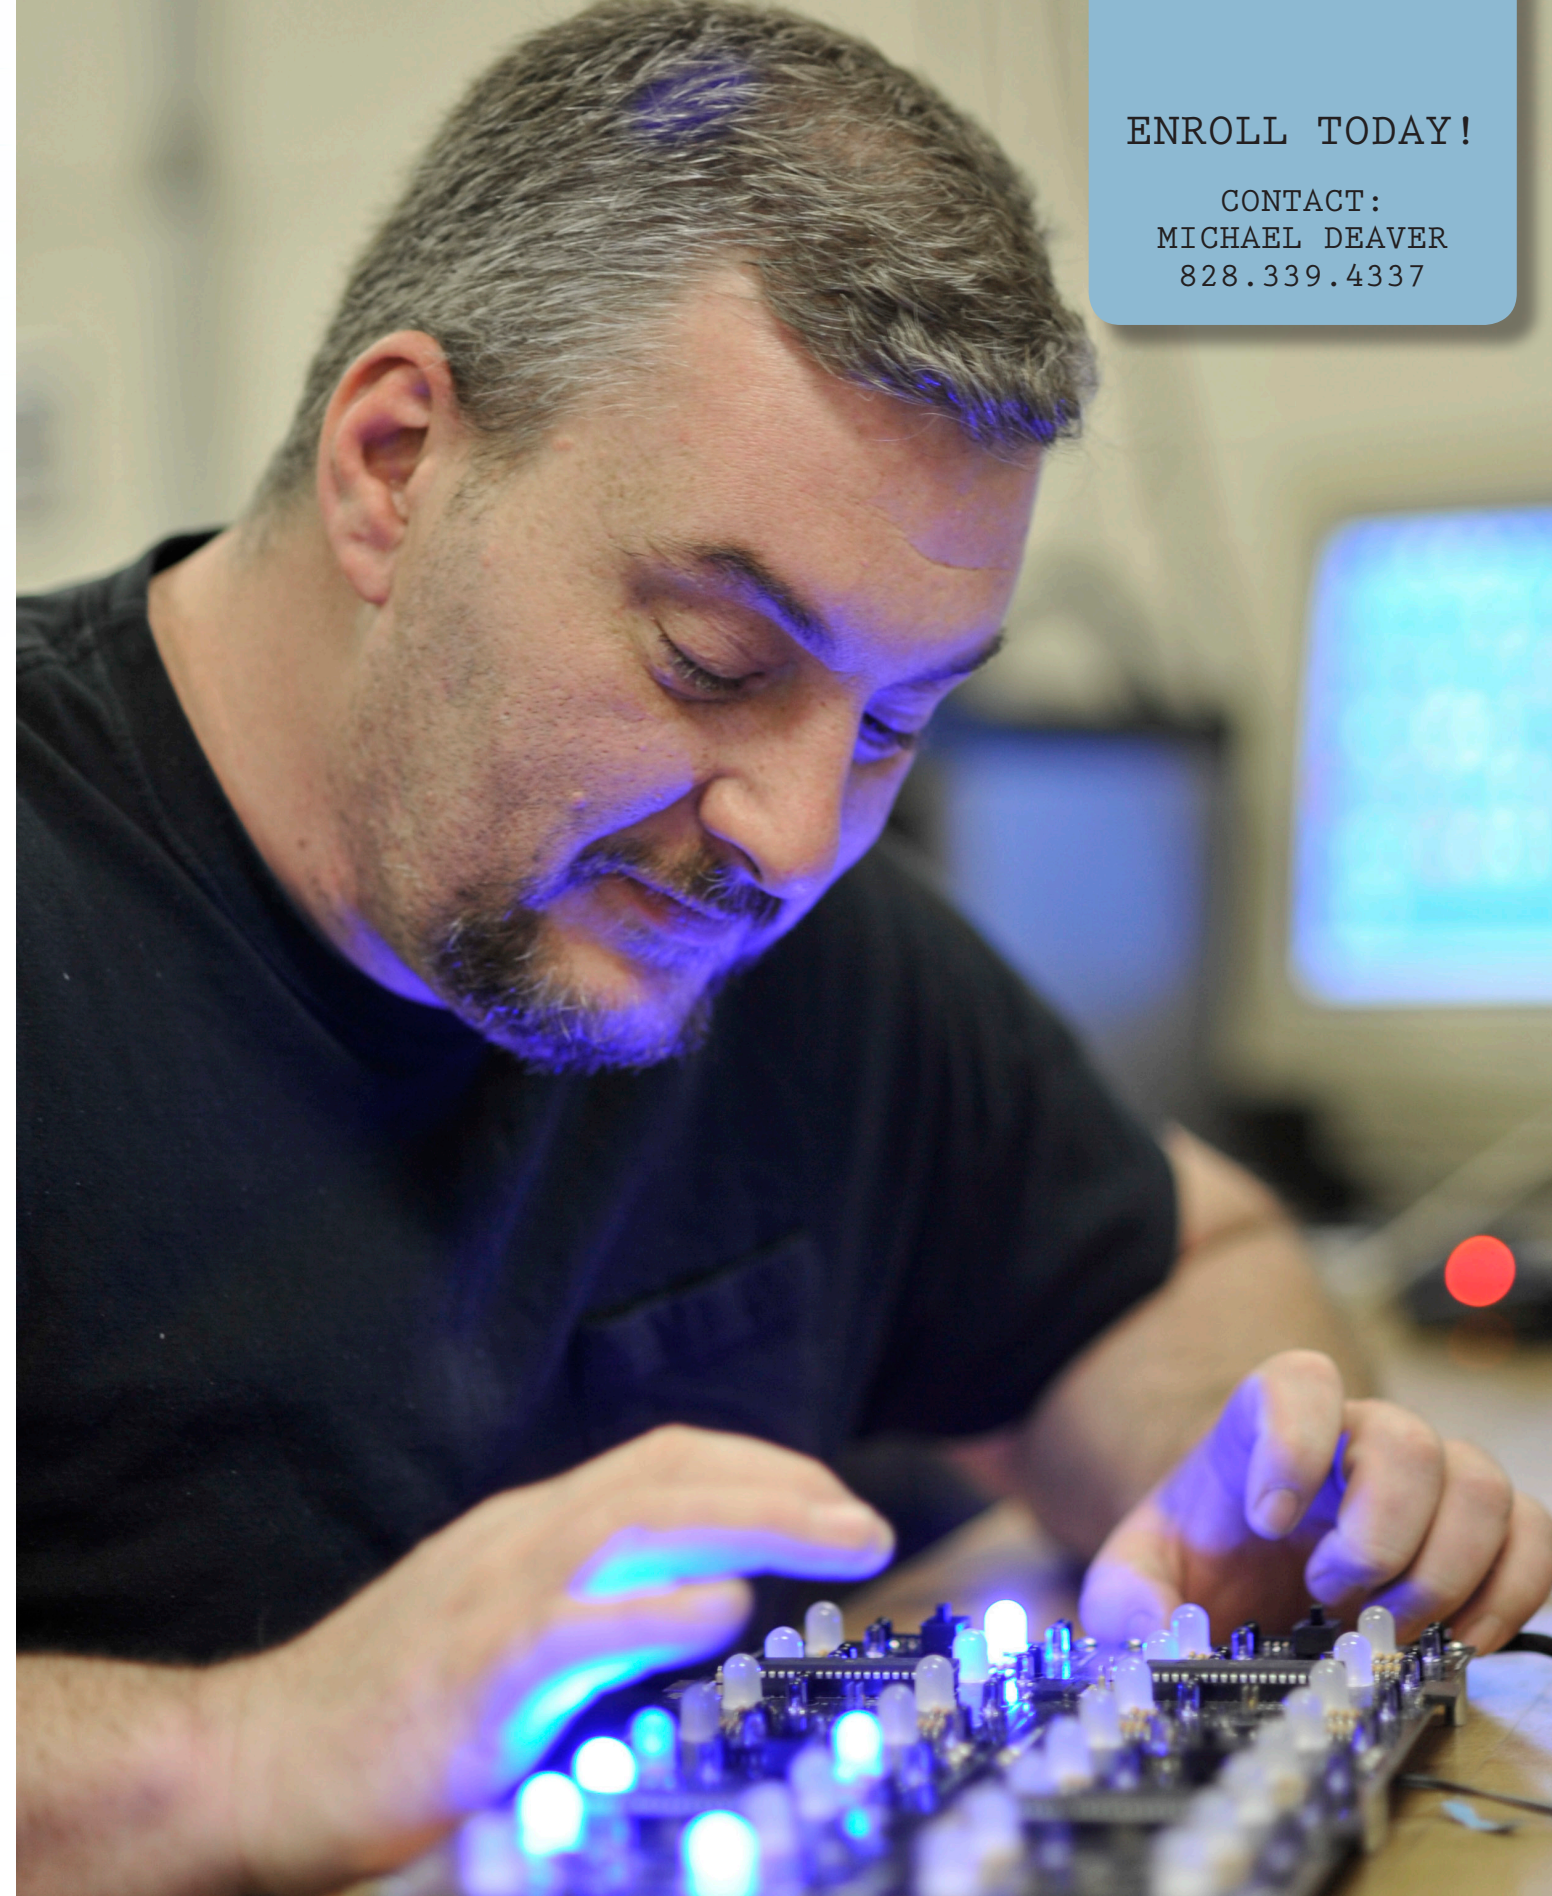

"It's a lot faster paced, and there's a lot more to do," Warner said. "Everything is so close to me here and I just go and do it. I did sacrifice driving a car; everything I need is within walking distance. We use trains (to go farther distances). They are always on time for sure."

Warner recently returned to Western North Carolina for the first time in three years but said the lessons he learned at SCC are never far from his mind.

"Everything I learned from SCC translates very well; I continue to build and learn off those fundamentals every day," Warner said. "Every time I think about SCC, I think back to how it feels like family. I had a lot of really great moments there."

"I came to this country from Russia when I was adopted at age 10, and I worked in a factory after high school – scraping to get by. But once I enrolled at SCC, my life started turning around. Even before I graduated, I had already landed a job making more than $50,000 a year."
